

SIDE 7 BROOKE MONOLOG

BROOKE is thrilled and proud that she's pregnant. Her goal is to raise children who will fight for humanity, by killing vampires. She's trying to explain to the other women that even though they're exhausted of the never-ending fight, why the fight must always continue.

But if no one tries, how will we know if it can be done? Women have been risking it forever. It's what we do best. Our mind, body, and spirit are superhuman at times. Don't you guys feel it? Risking, pushing, fighting? It's primal. We already do everything. More than any man and while slow-cooking humans in our bellies! Women have been giving birth in caves and fields since the dawn of creation. Nothing slows us down. We should be on pedestals. We're not the weaker sex. We're freaking gods! We've been doing it for thousands of years, but at least right now, we don't have to worry about sabretooth tigers. Why can't we add "vampire slaying" to the bass-ass-women-accomplishments list? I mean we do something, 99.9% of the world doesn't do or even knows about it! Think about that! This is our magnificent quest. Yes, there's more vamps than ever, and they feel embolden with their numbers on the rise. Do we want to leave this mess for the next generation? Don't we want to prepare them, help them, guide them? Our cause has been passed down by generations of mothers. Thousands of years, we've passed down our knowledge, before Stonehenge, before the pyramids. As long as there have been women on earth, they have been fighting vamps, even during the age of the sabretooth. It's what we do.
